To accommodate the signature structure, the gym (the house surprisingly did not have one), Broberg annexed the two-car garage, replacing the overhead doors with a combination of 12-foot fixed windows and sliders. "All the glass creates an immediate connection to the outdoors," she says. "The views capture your attention and beckon you to enter," says Broberg.

The other part of the home to receive such careful attention was the kitchen, the one place both husband and wife like to use in tandem. Designed by Smith River Kitchens, Broberg's custom kitchen-cabinet company, the space is at once light and spacious, thanks to careful window placement (including a pass-through that opens to a porch) and doors.

At the center, a large stainless-steel island provides plenty of space to prepare and serve meals. "A section of the island's custom top can be switched for wood or marble depending on the item being prepared," explains Broberg. The range, which sits directly behind the island, anchors a wall with a window that connects to the screened-in porch, where the family likes to spend a lot of time. It contains a large teak table and a pair of sofas and doubles as a dining room in the summer.

The effect is a home that lives and breathes nature and exercise; a home that is truly a reflection of its owners and their interests.
